

Acknowledgments

This book reports on my walks through the laboratories of cognitive neuroscience that use functional magnetic resonance imaging technology as their primary mean of investigation. I am grateful to the inhabitants of those spaces who opened their everyday life to my visits: the cognitive neuroscientists at the University of California, San Diego (UCSD) and the Salk Institute. From them I learned not only about cognitive neuroscience, brain imaging, and the excitements of their work, but also about collaboration, multidisciplinary, and generosity. I am enormously indebted to Marty Sereno. Special thanks go to Wendy Ark, Geoff Boynton, Marisa Brandt, Karen Emmorey, Don Hagler, Ed Hubbard, Dan Kennedy, Silvia Paparello, Brianna Paul, Susan Peppas, Melissa Saenz, Ayse Saygin, Joan Stiles, Stephen McCullough, Hsin-Hao Yu, and all the participants in my study.

I am grateful for the intellectual support and engaging scholarship of my colleagues and students in the Department of Communication at UCSD. I am particularly appreciative to Lisa Cartwright, Mike Cole, Ivana Guarrasi, Dan Hallin, Chandra Murkeji, and Carol Padden, who read and commented versions of this manuscript. I also immensely enjoyed the exchanges that the Program in Science Studies, Program in Math and Science Education, and California Institute for Telecommunication and Information Technology have provided.

My undergraduate and graduate adviser in Philosophy and Semiotics at the University of Bologna, Umberto Eco, and my graduate adviser in Cognitive Science at UCSD, Ed Hutchins, have irreversibly shaped the way I ask questions. The members of my Ph.D. committees—Lisa Cartwright, Seana Coulson, Charles Goodwin, Gilles Fauconnier, and Patrizia Violi—provided a huge amount of advice, challenge, and encouragement.

I learned a great deal from Anne Beaulieu, Monika Buscher, Giovanna Franci, Philip Lieberman, Michael Lynch, David Mindell, Lucy Suchman, and Elizabeth Wilson. Thank you for your generosity and the work you do.

I am thankful to Maurizio Marchetti for helping me prepare the visuals for this book.

Portions of this text, reworked and rewritten for the purposes of this book, have been previously published in Journal of Cognition and Culture, Journal of Social Epistemology, Science Images and the Popular Images of the Sciences, Semiotica, and Social Studies of Science. I am grateful to the editors, publishers, reviewers, and my co-authors who influenced this book through their contribution to those articles.

My study has also benefited from discussions and teaching of Aaron Cicourel, Elena Collavin, Jeff Elman, Yrjö Engeström, David Groppe, Deborah Forster, John Haveland, Jim Hollan, Ron Langacker, Marta Kutas, Javier Movellan, Katrina Petersen, Leigh Star, Mark Turner, and Ying Wu. I feel so privileged to be part of the UCSD community with you.

Marguerite Avery at MIT Press has been the best imaginable editor. I am also grateful to Katherine Almeida and Johna Picco for their editorial help with the manuscript, and to the three reviewers who provided invaluable suggestions and comments.

I am deeply thankful to my family—Mirjana, Žarko, Josipa, Gorana, Sandro, Federico, and Miro—for their “nema zime,” and to Maurizio and Lucy for always leaving with me.